The Quest for Improvement

This week sees me in Singapore attending the World Educational Leadership Summit along with over 4,000 delegates from 25 countries. It sounds important and I guess it is. I will be attending with Auckland colleagues from schools such as Remuera, Kings School (Remuera), Takapuna Normal Intermediate School and Balmoral. I expect to see a number of familiar faces during the next few days along with many faces that will become more familiar during the course of the gathering; such is the nature of these events where so much is learned outside of the formal sessions. Rather like school, really. The summit promises to bring together some wonderful speakers including Sir Ken Robinson on the topic of 'leading a school culture of innovation'. If you ever want to be informed and entertained go to TED Talks (Technology, Entertainment, Design) and search for Ken Robinson – he is one of the most viewed of all the contributors and for good reason.

Attending such a gathering in Singapore is not a whim. It is part of the well supported professional development culture we are fortunate to have at our school. Placing emphasis on professional development is (as it should be) in our school's DNA. I write fortunate as improving teacher capability is fundamental to improving student achievement. The Education Review Office (ERO, 2014) acknowledges the importance of teaching capability to accelerate student progress and, as Dylan William (2016) asserts, 'increasing the number of effective teachers in our schools will raise achievement of all students.' Hence, a school being committed to on-going teacher improvement is of utmost importance and, naturally, professional development is not confined to the principal!

During this term our teachers have been working (in school and in class) with a maths advisor who has, for a number of years, been supporting the continued development of our programmes across the school. On a recent Saturday 12 of our teachers attended a whole day training course for the teaching of maths. Later this week our teachers will be working with Lane Clark, an educational leader based in Canada, who has been working with the school to deepen the quality of our inquiry teaching. A considerable amount of our professional development is 'school grown' with teams of teachers identifying students with particular needs and devising specific teaching programmes to better meet the needs of these students. This is 'teaching as inquiry' and is in evidence across the school. Recently Nikki Urlich visited a number of schools in Melbourne as well as attending the Future Schools conference in that city. Professional development also encompasses improving understanding of leadership. A number of our teachers have gained post graduate qualifications in educational leadership and two more are embarking on this course of study this year.

Learning should be a life-long journey. As our world changes so does education. I won't go on about 'educating our children for jobs that do not yet exist' but we do know enough about our current societal landscape to know that not everything that worked in the past will either work in the future or will be good enough. Our task is always to make informed decisions in terms of what we must retain from the past and current practice (quite a lot, actually) and what we need to improve or change in order to prepare our children for the next stage in their educational journey. To do that, as teachers (and principals) we must engage in our own learning. As ERO said in their last review of our school (2016) 'the quality of teaching is high.....a continued focus on improvement through professional learning and collegial support is a strong feature of the school.' Long may this continue.

Taylor Cansdale Griffin finished as the top bowler for the whole of the North Harbour competition, as well as picking up the prize for top bowler for his age group at East Coast Bays Cricket Club.

Tana Wilson also excelled as a bowler in the competition and finished the season with the fourth best bowling stats.

Well done boys!

CBS Swim Team make it 3 in a row!

Last Thursday our swim team competed in the North Shore Primary Schools Swim meet at the National Aquatic Centre at AUT Millennium.

Every member of the team did an exceptional job representing CBS both in and out of the pool.

Twenty three schools competed in the meet and the final results have just come in with CBS taking top school for the third year running, winning the meet by 355 points. Both our girls and boys teams did exceptionally well.

Our girls team finished as the second highest scoring girls team and our boys were the highest scoring boys team with 755 points.

Our boys team points alone would have put us as 4th place overall.

Quite a remarkable achievement!

A full report with individual results will be published in the next newsletter.
